Do: You provide the student with a story to read. Questions about characterization often may be answered by "what" rather than "why" because the reader is comparing events to the character to find out. In the lesson, focus the student ability to make inferences of a character they read to see. Have them draw a new character and draw a picture showing how they are different from the character they read. The different aspects of characters that can be changed: actions, dialogue, relationships, appearance, etc. Have a list of these aspects and let the student choose an aspect to change. Let them draw a character, complete the diagram, and draw the new character. Have the student compare the two, focusing on the different aspects of the character.	Do: You provide a character with a story to read. Understanding characters often involves their actions. In a story, the character's actions are often the key to understanding them. Have students draw a character and draw a picture showing how they are different from the character they read.
