Chapter Thirteen

A handful of stars still blazed through the brightening sky to the east. The men who prowled in the deep blue shadow of the tall, jagged spines of rock held their pistols, their rifles, their shotguns with a grim avidity, itching to use them. Many of their lean coyote faces bore cuts and bruises, their clothing torn and dusty. Here and there an arm dangled broken in a makeshift sling. About the low fires that stretched at intervals along this particular hilltop, they passed bottles back and forth. They spoke quietly of comrades newly dead, and of imminent revenge, and above all, of the hatefulness of cattle.

Lyle Rankin had no such thoughts. He stood at the edge of a bluff that overlooked distant Loveland below, rocking slightly back and forth upon his heels like a child on Christmas morning. The cattle could be rounded up again -- indeed, what were Scowen and his ragged bunch for, if not such tedious labor? His coat and pants still reeked of the burning house at Sparks Fork, but a bath and an airing-out would soon set that to right. Soon the contracts would be back in his possession, and his success once more assured.

And he would see the lovely Miss McMillan again. He still had not yet decided whether he would kill her. Or, if so, how quickly.
