group's findings indicate that the use of a single, standardized, self-report measure of perceived stress may not be the best way to assess perceived stress in a community sample. The authors suggest that future research should consider the use of multiple measures of perceived stress, including self-report, physiological measures, and behavioral measures, to provide a more comprehensive assessment of perceived stress in a community sample.

It has been noted that language nonfluencies increasingly reflect developmental changes from being the main consequence of lexical problems and the absence of lexical items ('lexicality') to being used primarily for regulating and organizing a task and depending upon context. Such fluency, increasing steadily with age, may regulate the child's rate of responding and the focus of the work, controlling what the child does (they choose to work on) or where to go next, and so on (Levy 1977, 1981). Further, it may also be that fluency may be required in the early stages of literacy (from fluency being the main concern) to allow them to be preoccupied with more complex goals as well as controlling their task and responding to the context. It also seems that the overall ability to regulate and the cognitive resources (Bryant 1983) may be important for improving the quality of work during the early stages of the development of the child and may be related to ability. This is supported by evidence in other papers in this Special Issue regarding literacy from other authors (John & Hillman 1985) as well as a consideration of MacLachlan's theories about 'learning' (MacLachlan 1987).
