1. Background of the community. The community is a rural one, situated in a valley, with a population of about 1000 people. The main occupation is agriculture, with a mix of rice cultivation and animal husbandry. The community has a history of traditional knowledge and practices, particularly in the field of natural medicine. There is a high incidence of non-communicable diseases, such as hypertension and diabetes, among the elderly population.

2. Community members involved in the study. The study involved 100 community members, including men and women of different ages. The participants were recruited through a snowball sampling technique, where individuals were asked to refer their friends and family members who had knowledge of traditional medicine. The participants were informed about the study's purpose and the confidentiality of their information.

3. Methodology. The study used a qualitative approach, involving semi-structured interviews. The interviews were conducted in a private setting, with the participants being assured of the confidentiality of their responses. The participants were asked to share their knowledge of traditional medicine, including the names of the plants used, their properties, and the conditions for which they were used. The interviews were tape-recorded and transcribed, with the participants being given the opportunity to review and correct any errors in the transcription.

4. Analysis of the data. The data was analyzed using thematic analysis, where the transcripts were read and re-read to identify common themes and patterns. The themes identified included the use of plants for medicinal purposes, the knowledge of traditional medicine, and the impact of modernization on traditional medicine. The analysis was conducted by two researchers, with any discrepancies being resolved through discussion and consensus.

5. Findings. The study found that the community has a rich tradition of traditional medicine, with many plants used for medicinal purposes. The knowledge of traditional medicine is passed down through generations, with older members of the community being the primary source of information. The participants reported that the use of traditional medicine has been effective in treating various illnesses, particularly in the absence of modern medical facilities. The study also found that the impact of modernization on traditional medicine is significant, with many plants being lost due to habitat destruction and the use of modern agricultural practices. The participants expressed concern about the loss of traditional knowledge and the need to preserve it for future generations.

6. Conclusion. The study highlights the importance of traditional medicine in the community, and the need to preserve and protect this knowledge. The findings suggest that traditional medicine can be an effective complement to modern medical practices, particularly in rural areas. The study also emphasizes the need for further research in this field, to better understand the properties and uses of traditional plants.
