New Zealand English

Navigating the unique accent, pronunciation and vocabulary

Our author describes her experience with New Zealand English.

I'm an Australian citizen and worked and lived in New Zealand for four years before moving to Germany. I have experienced the beauty of the land, the kindness of the people and the deliciousness of the food. And I have also experienced the uniqueness of learning New Zealand English.

One might say that English is English, but "Kiwi-land English" is like no other. Parallels are often made between Australian English and New Zealand English, but the two varieties of English are not the same.

English has been used in New Zealand for over 200 years. The way New Zealanders speak English sounds very different to the way it is spoken in the USA or the UK, however.

The New Zealand accent is said to be based on the accent of south-east England, where a lot of the first European settlers to New Zealand came from.

Here are a few points that are important to know about New Zealand English:

- New Zealanders speak very fast.
- Vowels (the sounds the letters A, E, I, O, and U make) can sound very different in New Zealand English when compared to American English or British English. For example, the word 'kit' in New Zealand English sounds more like 'cut'.

A visit to a farmer's market in New Zealand, such as this one at Christchurch, is a way to practise English with the locals.

- The 'r' sound is often very soft when Kiwis speak and sometimes it's hard to hear it at all! For example, the word 'farm' sounds more like 'faahm'. This can be confusing for anyone who has learnt American English where the 'r' sound is very obvious.
- An 'i' after a vowel can sometimes sound like a vowel sound – so 'feel' is pronounced 'fee-u'.
- Kiwis often speak with a rising tone at the end of a sentence, which makes it sound like they are asking a question.

The New Zealand dialect is so unique that in my early years of living and working there I was even asking myself if English was actually the language the locals spoke. I often had to ask them to repeat their sentences, but luckily the New Zealand people are kind and have a lot of patience.

In addition to the different sounds found in the language, the vocabulary in New Zealand is also special. I found the mix of British, Australian, Māori and creative home-grown expressions to be somewhat entertaining.

From pronunciation to accent, rising tone and vocabulary, when it comes to the language, speaking with New Zealanders truly is an experience like no other! ■
