

Writing a Philosophy Paper

PETER H. SPADER

Marywood College, Scranton, Pennsylvania

It is not easy to get students to understand what is unique about Philosophy. We can tell them what Philosophy is in our lectures, we can pick readings which demonstrate philosophers in action, we can use Socratic dialogue to initiate reflective questioning, but eventually they must face the task of doing some philosophical thinking and writing on their own. The first philosophy paper is a traumatic experience for many students and I have searched for ways to make it less so. With this article I share one of my attempts: a short essay I have prepared for handout to my students as they face their first paper assignment.

Use of such a handout is risky. As with any short handout, there is too much left out and oversimplified. Furthermore, there are excellent introductions to philosophical technique and logic now available in book form which do a thorough job. The problem with such books is that the cost of text materials is now so high I cannot assign another book on top of the content-oriented readings I want to use, especially given the short amount of time we could devote to it. Still, I believe students need help and direction. The following handout on technique is my present compromise. Perhaps it will be of help to you as well.

Writing a Philosophy Paper

Writing a paper for a philosophy class can be a problem. Simply presenting a body of facts will not be enough and more than just a report of your personal opinion is called for. What, then, is expected of you? This essay is intended to help you get a sense of what is expected and how to do it.

First of all, a philosophy paper is not simply a report of opinions, yours or those of people you read. It is a careful and sustained questioning by you. To question here means to rethink in your own mind the issues studied. This questioning involves an examination and reexamination of what you have learned about the topic. Here are some examples of the types of specific questions you may well find yourself asking as you prepare a philosophy paper:

- 1) What, exactly, is the philosophical problem here? (Until you clarify what you are concerned about you will not be able to see and take clear positions concerning the problem.)
