Who Lives in the United States?

To keep track of the population, the United States government conducts a census every ten years. A census is a count of people living in the nation. The government sends a questionnaire to each household. The members of that household answer the questions and send it back to the government.

While the government counts people, it can also collect information about them. The questionnaire asks about people's gender, age, job, and income. This information helps the government learn about its citizens. Then it can make sure they are being treated fairly. Table 1 shows information from the United States Census completed in 2010.

Gender and Age
Total Population

	Estimate
Male	308,740,508
Female	151,781,326
65 years and over	156,964,212
40,267,984

Table 1

The census also asks about the languages people speak at home. This helps the government know how to share important information. It can inform people about health, emergencies, voting, or public programs in different languages. The language data only refers to people ages 5 and older. Table 2 shows language data from the United States Census completed in 2010.

Four family will receive a census questionnaire someday. When that happens, you'll know the importance of reporting this information to the government.

Population 5 years and over

Speak only English at home	Number of speakers
Speak a language other than English at home	291,524,091
Spanish	200,947,091
French	60,577,000
Italian	37,071,767
German	1,801,443
Russian	723,432
Arabic	1,083,437
Other	905,840
