The section will be identical to an analysis of the direct learning of numerical concepts used the Discrepancy test.

As you can see, the two pie charts are identical in terms of the amount of shading. The question is asking the student to identify the difference. These items are extremely difficult and educational researchers have suggested that even teenagers of similar intelligence, if given a numerical concept like this, will respond to it as if it were random. This question gives them two sets of numbers and asks them to compare them. If the question is random, then the student will have no idea what to do.

What I expected: What I expected was random

Adolescents may be taught to find the difference between two numbers without knowing why. If the question is random, then the student will likely just subtract the two numbers. If the question is asking for the difference in proportions, then the student will likely subtract the two percentages. These students may also just subtract the percentages and then divide by the smaller number to get a percentage difference. This is not the correct answer.

What I expected: Difference not random

What I expected: Random

Interestingly, students seem to have a misconception that the question is asking them to subtract the two numbers and calculate the difference of the two numbers. This is not the correct answer.

What I expected: What I expected was random

Adolescents think the question is asking them to subtract the two numbers. They are also likely to subtract the two percentages. This is not the correct answer. The student's natural instinct when they are asked to subtract is to subtract the two percentages. This is not the correct answer.

What I expected: Difference not random

What I expected: Random

The question is focused on the concept of direct learning and discrepancy.

- If this question they believe is random, then they are responding to the question that they have been given and are not reading the question.
