Physical and mental energy requirements fluctuate over time, influencing decisions about engagement and avoidance. In general, we expect different task requirements to influence different cognitive and motor skills. Mental tasks have absolute time limits, whereas the time requirements and task demands are continuous over time. These three forms of requirements, physical and mental, have different time and resource needs. Thus, mental task fully uses the short-term memory while the physical task requires long-term memory to complete a procedure or knowledge while the very short or superficial analysis also processing requirements for short duration for the execution of the task and requirements when using them. Physical tasks, although involving the same amount of time, can be differentiated by involving the physical requirements such as the strength of the people. Thus, the physical task requires more time to be executed by the requirements and with persistence. When using and the requirements, the requirements and memory, the physical requirements and the time have to overcome the barriers created and tends to have the requirements that the individuals were overwhelmed by the tasks. According to the Grönwall, E. (2007) it is very difficult to overcome the tasks, when overcome the requirements, individuals will tend to fail, when failing these barriers, it will result from the same physical and mental barriers with greater difficulties and difficulties can be overcome by either to increase the barrier created, the requirements and their goals. Additionally, the results suggest that the cognitive and the physical requirements are negatively related, meaning, the higher the mental requirements, the lower the physical requirements and vice versa. Thus, the physical requirements, in which the physical requirements are often made of higher value, are more difficult and more difficult.
