 Florian Heiss, 2007 Medicare Part D provides prescription drug coverage through Medicare approved plans offered by private insurance companies and HMOs In this paper we study the role of current prescription drug use and health risks related expectations and subjective factors in the demand for prescription drug insurance To characterize rational behavior in the complex Part D environment we develop an intertemporal optimization model of enrollment decisions We generally find that seniors choices respond to the incentives provided by their own health status and the market environment as predicted by the optimization model The proportion of individuals who do not attain the optimal choice is small but the margin for error is also small since enrollment is transparently optimal for most eligible seniors Further there is also evidence that seniors over react to some salient features of the choice situation do not take full account of the future benefit and cost consequences of their decisions or the expected net benefits and risk properties of alternative plans Pharmacy Management Shane P Desselle, David P.
