the Bioethics of Globalization, Justice and Hegemony Ubaka Ogbogu, Donrich Thaladar, Nishakanthi Gopalan, 2025-12-10 This volume examines regenerative medicine RM through a global bioethics lens that foregrounds the structural asymmetries epistemic exclusions and governance disparities shaping its development and uptake RM refers to a range of innovative therapies clinical interventions and research activities aimed at repairing or replacing damaged or diseased human cells tissues and organs with an emphasis on conditions currently considered incurable While RM is often discussed using examples standards and governance models from high income countries the so called Global North much less is documented about its realities in low and middle income countries LMICs particularly in the Global South These contexts are frequently overlooked in ways that understate their contributions impose ill fitting external frameworks or perpetuate assumptions of absence or inactivity Such omissions contribute to epistemic injustice in which certain perspectives priorities and knowledge systems are marginalized in global health innovation Responding to this imbalance the present work assembles interdisciplinary contributions from scholars and practitioners deeply engaged with RM in LMICs It adopts a collaborative bioethics approach that does not treat ethics as an afterthought to technological progress but as integral to how innovation is imagined governed and shared The collection employs a reconnaissance mode of inquiry to reveal underexplored practices governance dynamics and normative perspectives allowing for locally grounded accounts that resist the constraints of dominant narratives The chapters in the volume are organized in two parts Foundational Critiques Analytical treatments of epistemic injustice global asymmetries and ethical pluralism in RM National Case Studies Country specific explorations of RM governance practice and ethics in diverse settings across Africa Asia and Eastern Europe By illuminating both the commonalities and divergences that emerge from these contexts this book offers a richer more inclusive account of RM and its ethical governance It challenges the hegemony of Global North perspectives and points toward bioethical frameworks that are pluralistic context sensitive and globally responsive From Internet of Things to Internet of Intelligence Marcel
