Although the studies with 8.5 months' spontaneous spontaneous memory were not as well replicated as a follow-up study, this could not have easily been done as several months elapsed in between the follow-up and baseline studies. However, the spontaneous memory of 8.5 months' spontaneous memory were found to be significantly greater than the baseline. Thus, children with autism, like all normally developing children, have the ability to store information in memory.

It is particularly important to note that the authors acknowledge that the experimental design cannot be considered a true test of the hypothesis. The authors state that the experimental design is a "preliminary test" and that the results are "preliminary" and that the authors are "cautious" in their conclusions. The authors also state that the experimental design is "not a true test" and that the results are "preliminary" and that the authors are "cautious" in their conclusions.
