Based on the above information, the following figure is a schematic diagram of the proposed system architecture for the remaining three years. The main difference from Figure 1 is that the functional characteristics of the system are now clearly defined. The main problem is to identify the functional requirements for each functional block and to define the data flow between them. The system is divided into three main functional blocks: the data collection block, the data processing block, and the data storage and retrieval block. The data collection block is responsible for collecting data from various sources, such as sensors, cameras, and databases. The data processing block is responsible for processing the collected data, such as filtering, analyzing, and summarizing. The data storage and retrieval block is responsible for storing the processed data and providing quick access to it. The system also includes a user interface for interacting with the data.
