Recommender Systems for Manual Testing Breno

Miranda,Juliano Iyoda,2012-01 Software testing is an arduous and expensive activity In the context of manual testing any effort to reduce the test execution time and to increase defect findings is welcome One approach is to allocate test cases according to the testers profile in a way to maximise testing productivity However optimising the allocation of manual test cases is not a trivial task in large companies test managers are responsible for allocating hundreds of test cases among several testers We implemented 2 assignment algorithms for test case allocation and defined 3 tester profiles based on recommender systems the same kind of system that recommends for example a book at Amazon com Our allocation systems take into account the tester s effectiveness valid defects found in the past and expertise ability to run tests with certain characteristics We performed a controlled experiment in a real industrial setting in order to compare our allocation systems to the manager s allocation and to random allocations The findings of this research are especially useful to software testing professionals or anyone else who wants to better understand how the manual software testing process works
